Who Will Ask the Four Questions?

Written by: Naomi Ben-Gur
Illustrated by: Carmel Ben-Ami

Eitan always asks the Four Questions at his family's Passover seder...but this year, his younger sister Evie says she's old enough to do it. What will Eitan do if Evie takes this job away from him?

Community Engagement

There are few things more Jewish than asking questions. What we call "The Four Questions" is really one big question with four answers. Using this theme, think of four questions to ask your community. Maybe even use the questions from the book flap. Display questions in the lobby of your building and provide Post-it notes and markers to answer them. Consider folding those questions and answers into a community-wide seder or other Passover celebration.

Classrooms

Passover is the most widely celebrated Jewish holiday in North America, and with that there's often the expectation that the children in our learning environments will be learning the "Ma Nishtana" to sing at family seders. Make sure to communicate clearly what the plan is for classroom learning around Passover. There are many other ways to explore this theme, like using the great PJ Library Question Catcher: www.pjfor.me/question-catcher.

At a seder

If you're hosting a community seder this year, consider adding the reading of this book as one of the steps; maybe right before the traditional recitation of The Four Questions. It can certainly calm the nerves of children who might be anxious about chanting the words in public for the first time and models the importance of supporting one another in any type of new endeavor.

Haggadah

Did you know that PJ Library has produced a fantastic Haggadah for families? This beautifully illustrated guide to the seder will make your Passover experience more family friendly, as a guest or a host. For more information on how to order hard copies or download it, go to www.pjlibrary.org/haggadah.
